Engine exhaust systems, in particular for diesel engines, have a number of exhaust components that have to be assembled to form a functional unit. These components include a collecting pipe or silencer, a venturi, a tailpipe, and an exhaust element. In order to provide sealing between these components, it is known to bond the components together, so that the components are inseparable. In the process of bonding the components together, it is desirable to provide a high-quality connection that does not leak and is durable, but that can be easily assembled. In this context, EP 2 089 819 A1, for example, discloses a manufacturing method that bonds an exhaust element to an exhaust pipe by a heat shrink process. In this process, first, the exhaust element and the exhaust pipe are positioned next to each other such that a joining flange of the exhaust element is positioned in a sealing abutment of the exhaust pipe. Subsequently, the exhaust element is heated, and a bonding agent is applied to the joining flange of the exhaust element. The exhaust element is then shrunk to the exhaust pipe, and the bonding agent is cured to form a durable bond. The manufacturing method requires a supply of bonding agent. Furthermore, a separate step of curing the bonding agent is required.

The Australian dollar continued its upward trajectory, pushing to the highest level since February 2016 on Friday as expectations of RBA rate cuts for next month quickly increased, an indicator that the market was starting to anticipate the Reserve Bank of Australia will ease policy from its cash rate target in June. When asked if the board would continue to cut rates in June, Westpac senior economist Matthew Hassan said "yes" and explained the ASX is reacting to the Fed's statement, which was about 1.5 per cent more hawkish than expected. "Today's statement was [for] June 3 and the board says they will continue to cut rates," he said. "The board usually announces a rate cut on the first of the month or the second of the month and so the fact they are talking about June is the reason why [the ASX] is moving higher." Over the same time period, the US dollar has fallen against most of its 82157476af
